

Charvaak Pati

Charvaak Pati holds a PhD from York University, Toronto., and an M.Phil. from University of Delhi. He works at the intersection of political science and geography and examines how political practices, including political mobilization, draws its inspiration from specific temporal and spatial contexts. His doctoral research looked at the trade union practices of auto workers in India and how they are spatially embedded within their industrial contexts. His current research interests encompass industrial relations and the moral questions workers face during collective action. His second research project, currently in its early stages, examines Just Transition policies and their impact on India's automobile industry, with a specific focus on employment implications for workers navigating the shift toward sustainable manufacturing and electric vehicle production. He is a reviewer for Science & Society and Human Geography journals and has published in reputed journals and edited collections.
